

The criterion of truth in true science, just as in true science and religion, is experience. Each finally points to the same truth to be won by experiment. They are all experiential disciplines.